

4-Way Test

Timothy Shearin

Sometimes in life we meet people who seem to live by a higher standard than others. These people make the rest of us want to be better. They possess good moral character. They are truthful, fair, and offer goodwill and friendship towards others. I have been blessed to know one fine example. This person is my grandmother.

My grandmother is always kind to everyone she meets. I have never seen her without a smile on her face. She believes in being truthful and kind to everyone. She is always willing to go the extra distance for others. My grandmother always carries herself with grace and integrity. She is very trustworthy and expects others to be the same towards her.

My grandmother has told me to always tell the truth no matter what. Even when I think I may get in trouble for something, she says that being truthful is the better way. I do my best to abide by her wishes and to follow her example.

My grandmother is a very fair person. She listens to me if I have a problem, and sometimes even offers advice for these problems. When she does, she always seems to offer suggestions that help me but also considers the concerns of others that are involved. She always tells me whether I am right or wrong.

My grandma has told me to treat others with respect and the way that I want them to treat me. She expects me to use good judgment while I'm at school, at home, or anywhere that I may be. When it comes to expressing goodwill towards others, my grandma is the best. She is always cheerful and in good spirits. She is polite and good natured, and she's always kind and pleasant to be around. She is very compassionate and sympathetic towards the needs of others. She has a generous, caring heart. She often goes out of her way to help those in need.

I don't think anyone could have a better friend than my grandmother. She always supports me when I need her. She tells me and shows me that she loves me every time she sees me. She makes me feel appreciated. I am proud to call my grandma my friend. I think the world would be a better place if there were more people like her.
